

Parents as Advocates

An advocate is a person who speaks up for, acts on behalf of, or supports someone else. As a parent, you are the best person to advocate for your child because you know his strengths and needs, likes and dislikes. Unconditional love is a powerful motivator and it's been proven time and again that the squeaky wheel gets the grease. But how you squeak will determine how much grease you get!

As a parent advocate you will find others, such as teachers and physicians, who can support you in advocating for your child. Consider these professionals your allies; they can use their influence to assist you in receiving needed services and programs for your child. For example, a family doctor could write a letter to the school board describing the magnitude of the child's anxiety concerning his language immersion program to speed up his placement in a program where he will be taught in his first language.

Despite the professional help you will seek along your advocacy journey, you are your child's full-time advocate—the one with the file, so to speak, on ways to help him succeed socially and at school.

Parents make such good advocates because of their close, personal involvement with their children. Be aware that not all professionals you consult with will appreciate this closeness. Some professionals may take the view that you are too emotionally involved to be objective, implying that it is impossible for you to make rational decisions where your child is concerned. However, it may be your very connectedness that helps you understand that your child is different from his peers and that spurs you to take action to get him help.

As his trusted confidante, you know what really worries him and how complex his problems really are. You are the person who has drilled him on the multiplication tables night after night.

You were certain he knew them at bedtime on Monday night—how could he possibly have forgotten them by Tuesday morning? Likely, you are the person who knows how much school failure terrifies him. He has probably asked you, “What’s wrong with my brain?”

Parents often report a gut feeling that their child learns differently than other children. Many parents say they are relieved to discover that their child has a learning disability because they knew something was not quite right. Parents who bring these feelings to their family doctor, to their child's teacher and to school administrators may not be treated receptively. Try not to be discouraged. You know in your heart that you must speak up for your child. If you don't, who will?

Becoming an Effective Advocate

Parents need to know how and where to get appropriate information; then they need to communicate this information convincingly to the appropriate helping source. For example, a parent who is told that her child is behaving immaturely in this grade three class needs to visit the class on a couple of occasions for first-hand knowledge of the problem and its seriousness. Maybe a trip to the family doctor is in order or a conversation with another adult who works with child in the community (e.g., the cub leader). If the parent knows that the immature behavior stems from the fact that a sibling has been in the hospital for tests, it's best to let the teacher know so the child can get the support he needs during this stressful period. If a child is avoiding specific tasks at school (e.g., reading aloud in front of a group), the parent should understand that there must be a good reason.

To be an effective advocate, you should:

- develop the confidence to do your own advocating;

- develop problem solving techniques to overcome obstacles;
- find the information to make appropriate decisions;
- take appropriate actions;
- support your child's efforts towards independence;
- learn what your rights are and what your child's rights are;
- use effective communication in advocating for your rights;
- analyze problems and pinpoint areas of responsibility;
- learn about community resources and agencies;
- network with other parents and groups for mutual support; and
- connect with provincial/territorial Learning Disability Association (LDA) or your local chapter.

Self-Advocacy

Self-advocacy means speaking out and acting for yourself. Children whose parents have been active advocates for them know that they have supportive cheerleaders at home. They experience advocacy as part of everyday life.

Children who hear their parents speaking positively about them feel valued (e.g., John has a bent for electrical engineering not John never reads a book he just wastes his time repairing old radios). Feeling valued gives the child the confidence to speak up for himself so that he can get the help he needs (e.g., I'm finding it really hard to learn the order of the provinces). Sometimes a child will come up with his own coping strategies because he's so aware of his own difficulties (e.g., I made up a game to remember the names of the provinces by calling each one the name of a famous baseball player).

Research has shown that as children enter high school they are often unprepared to communicate their learning needs to others. Teenagers want to fit in with their peers. However, the adolescent who has been involved in his parents' advocacy efforts in elementary school or junior high will quite likely see it as normal behavior to ask for help with a problem subject or express his fear of exams. A child who knows he has short-term auditory memory problems can explain to the soccer coach that it's best to write the plays down on paper so that he can see them more clearly.

Parents can enhance their own advocacy skills by working with the child on ways to communicate best with the teacher (e.g., Do you feel comfortable telling Mrs. Smith the book report was too difficult or who she appreciate a note from me?). It can be a relief to know that there are accommodations available at school, such as calculators, computers, spell checkers and extra time on tests. Parents may advocate for the use of these tools, but it is the child who will use them and determine what works best in a variety of situations. Teachers, students and parents must work together and agree on appropriate accommodations.

Guidelines for Parent Advocates

- Understand extraordinary time commitment involved in advocacy efforts.
- Recognize that if you don't advocate for your child, no one else will.
- Recognize your limits and capacity to advocate; seek out advocacy allies.
- Model advocacy skills for your child.
- Use information as a powerful tool for understanding the puzzle of your child's learning disability.

Permission to reprint was granted in August 2004 to the Parent Information Network, Exceptional Student Services. This article was originally published by the Learning Disability Association of Canada on their website at: www.ldactaac.ca/english/indepth/advocacy/yorchild/4.htm